

All the forty defendants were in court when the jury filed in. Their wives and mothers and sisters and sweethearts were sitting near them.

The jury filed in. The faces of the defendants set in grim, hard lines; the women looked frightened.

Frank Dare, the foreman of the "farmers' jury," arose and began to read the verdict.

Smiles of happiness lighted the faces of Buckley and Seiffert and their women folk.

The others, the convicted ones, sat in stony silence.

Suddenly a cry rang through the room. A United States marshal crossed quickly to the side of the wife of Frank J. Painter of Omaha and carried her out of the courtroom. She had fainted.

Judge Anderson, in an even voice, thanked the jury for their "good and faithful" services.

The jurors departed immediately.

All spectators were ordered out of the room.

The convicted men were led forward one by one and handed over to United States marshals, who handcuffed them.

Wachmeister of Detroit cried like a baby as he was led to the bar.

In the corridors were gathered the wives and relatives of the prisoners. All were weeping, some silently, some hysterically.

The handcuffing was over. The defendants were led from the courtroom and out into the crowded city streets for the march to the county jail. There were fifty marshals guarding them. The procession was longer than two city blocks. Each convicted man was handcuffed to a marshal.

The prisoners marched with flushed, set faces, looking always straight ahead. Newsboys ran by their side offering to sell them newspapers containing accounts of their conviction. Small boys jeered at them.

The local chief of police and United States Marshal Schmidt led the procession. At the stone entrance to the jail Schmidt turned the prisoners over to Sheriff Jacob Woessner.

The prisoners will be sentenced Monday. Under the cumulative penalty system, which a federal judge may impose at his discretion, each defendant may be sentenced to thirty nine and one-half years.

Tomorrow, the day before they are sentenced, they will be allowed to see their wives and relatives.

Judge Anderson refused to listen to a motion for an appeal today. Perhaps he will listen to it Monday.
